The Turtles, who have always been outcasts, become a metaphor for Campbell's own journey of self-discovery.

The issue begins with a flashback to the Turtles' early days. Leonardo, the leader of the group, is struggling to come to terms with his own identity. He feels like he doesn't fit in with his brothers, and he longs for something more. This longing leads him to meet a group of other mutants, who help him to accept himself for who he is.

The story then cuts to the present day. The Turtles are now adults, and they are each facing their own challenges. Leonardo is still struggling with his identity, but he is now more confident in who he is. Donatello is grappling with the pressures of being a scientist, while Michelangelo is struggling to find his place in the world. Raphael, the most hot-headed of the Turtles, is dealing with his own anger and resentment.

As the Turtles face their own challenges, they must also come together to confront a new threat. The Foot Clan, led by Shredder, is back, and they are more powerful than ever before. The Turtles must put aside their differences and work together to defeat Shredder and save the city.
